Nr. 4c) The letter was written in 1861 by Sullivan Ballou to his wife. He wanted to tell her how deep in love he was with her but that he was also willing to die for the good of his country in the upcoming battles. During a battle, a cannonball hit him and tore away parts of his right leg. The rest of the leg was amputated, but Ballou died a week later, leaving behind his wife Sarah (24 years) and his two sons.

Nr. 4d) No, I wouldn't do that for my country. I am not that brave. I hope for the end of all wars and fighting in the world.

Nr. 6a)

- The men are black soldiers.
- They look tired and exhausted.
- They belong to the Northern Army.
- The photo was taken after the end of the Civil War, in 1865. Although they were often discriminated against by their white officers, these former slaves were proud that they had fought for the Northern army. They hoped they would be respected by the whites for fighting for the Union.
- Today, there wouldn't be only black soldiers on the photo because there aren't things like colored regiments anymore. There would also be white soldiers on the photo.

Nr. 6b)

200,000 black soldiers fought for the North, which made up about 10% of all Northern soldiers.
